In 2009, there were 8,100 registered prisoners from Canada in provincial correctional institutions, representing 0.7% of Canada's general population. Of this total, 4,000 were indigenous Canadian, representing 0.3% of the population.. Y 1 2 1 6 1.0 0.5 0.5 0.5 5 4 5 In terms of political clout, there appears to be little correlation between the overall size of the Diaspora and the average political influence in that province. On the contrary, there is relatively high correlation between the size of the Diaspora and the political influence of the provincial government.

Source: Prisoners in Provincial Correctional Institutions, 2004 and 2009. The trend is more pronounced for women. In the 1990s, there were more Diaspora female prisoners, while today there are fewer female Diaspora prisoners. It may be the reverse because Indigenous female prisoners were more frequent to begin with in this period.

While there are a number of factors (e.g. low rates of imprisonment for Indigenous people, the lack of adequate housing opportunity, and other factors) that contribute to lower rates of immigration, most argue that immigration is negatively correlated to low rates of incarceration. For example, those serving minimum-sentence sentences have a much higher level of incarceration on average; while many Diaspora women are incarcerated for no longer than 90 days, most indigenous men are incarcerated for more than three years, with or without parole..
